Students Delve Deeper into World War Two

We all know that World War Two was the most widespread war that America had ever dealt with. Officially starting with Germany's invasion of Poland in 1939 WWII affected more people than any war before it. With the mobilization of over hundred million military personnel and the recorded deaths of over sixty million WWII was something that the world had never seen and was something that it wasn't ready for.

When most Susan B. English students look back on past history classes most will realize that they never reached WWII. Fact is that barely any got past the Civil War. Being able to learn a part of history they never got a chance to keeps students intrigued. After all there are many connections that can be made between WWII and the war in Iraq. Making connections between present events and history is important in learning history.

If students are unable to make connections with the past history it may not stick.

Yet, is there a reason why most schools never reach WWII in their textbooks? Is that a part of history that schools found too graphic for young, impressionable minds? After all, the death and destruction happened on such a catastrophic scale, exposing children to images of the holocaust and of the bombing of Pearl Harbor might be something that parents and teachers don't want children to see. All you can think is that it is history, it happens and is likely to repeat again. By studying what happened in the past students will be better able to learn from the mistakes and triumphs of others. Students at SBE are now able to reach out and learn from a part of history that until this year was never taught to them.
